Much of the poorest of the oil company housing was demolished as part of the slum clearance programme during the 1920's and 30's. Entire communities were moved to new Council housing estates.

The decline of the shale industry continued after World War Two, and families moved away in search of work. Many of the remaining oil company houses fell vacant and were boarded up awaiting demolition. West Lothian became a land of ghost villages.